The strong formal entry qualities of this Georgian style home lead to a design concept, which incorporated two additions joined to the existing house with a one story “connector element”. In total four new bedroom suites were arranged to provide privacy and adjacency to the existing structure. A four-car garage was also included into the design.

The “connector” element contained circulation, transition space and part of the kitchen and provided service to all adjacent rooms. This is complimented by a strong diagonal of formal to informal that existing between the residence, the pool to the south, and the nearby stable to the east. Material studies for the “connector” ranged from a wood screening system to full open glazing.
